What's new:

Brew. Dream. Abandon. Die. That was my mission as a homebrewer. For better or worse, I failed. Being in the relatively small town of Middlefield, it is probably no coincidence that the recent arrival of the Coffin Rot Brewing Co. on Main Street was met with a decidedly mixed reception. Depending on the news source, coffee houses largely sided with the City in its having already licensed another business that has not yet opened up shop. And depending on the space a person was in, that same news source may or may not have mentioned at all how much space the new business was going to use. But the reason there was any debate is that the little ruby red spinning ball, my thumb-eye glinting just past the sill of my broken eyelids, reminded the public of what I was fighting every single day to build, and how much work has been done in such a short time. These are the tales of a man who spent the better part of his life trying to make things happen in his basement, whose razor-thin financial security meant that he could never let down his guard, and whose never-ceasing optimism and excitement convinced the well-heeled that his dreams might finally come true. Most of the pieces of the first color strip in the last story you read came from the manuscripts of the first five issues, the earliest of which was our first issue as the Independent Press. They were also the only ones to be accepted after my own dreams had since been dashed. Now none of them are online, we have only the odd bit of shrapnel, the odd advertisement for my long dead dream of becoming a professional skateboarder and racing team manager. I'm carrying on. And I think that it's foolish to not try, at least to my son's and grandson's benefit, to see if some elements of my infernal optimism will rub off on them. On one level, I would like to credit a very cool idea that just hit me one day at work. In the past, I had written stories where the hero very slowly goes from normal to mystical, or from just a little odd to a bumbling idiot to an arctic explorer to his own personal Zoltos. The idea behind this second path was to deal with both the difficulties of the mundane and the more complex processes of the mystical. Well, I came up with the idea of the reverse. Be at the starting point, the bureaucratic, silly, accident-prone,
