Is the electronic health record a critical educational component for surgical residents? The "purpose" of an IOM report. The American College of Surgeons has identified six Essential Competencies for surgical training as a basis for achievement of Accreditation Council for Graduate Medical Education surgical competencies. These Essential Competencies were identified to be necessary for all trainees to achieve independence in the surgical approach to patient care. However, training requires a continuum of medical education and not simply "individual competence," which represents a simplified view of the complexity of the relationships and interactions that characterize medical practice. To adequately address all Essential Competencies, effective communication and collaboration must occur among all members of a health-care team. The development of the electronic health record has become integral to health-care delivery at all levels. The skills necessary to gain proficiency in this technology will also foster better understanding of the rapidly changing world of medicine as a collaborative effort. Surgeons must play a role in ensuring that these changes are met with a commensurate need for education of residents in the skills and the concepts necessary to use the technology in a manner that
