More particularly, the present invention is directed to a method of bonding particulate material, such as metals, ceramics, ferro-magnets and high temperature alloy, and forming products by bonding through a selected liquid, such as solder or a molten glass, and to products formed using the method. The bonding method of the present invention can be applied to form a wide variety of products which are used in a variety of applications. Examples of these products include planar products, such as electronic components, and non-planar products, such as heat sink fins, tubular products, such as heat exchange tubes, and complex products, such as fan housings and exhaust housings. The bonding method of the present invention uses a bonding agent, which may be melted at a temperature lower than that of the bonding particulate material. This results in some advantages. First, the use of the bonding agent enables the bonding method to be used for bonding relatively complex configurations of the bonding particulate material. Second, the bonding agent and the bonding particulate material have similar melting points, which is useful in bonding non-planar products where the bonding particulate material is molten and bonded to form the product. Third, the bonding agent has good adhesion to the bonding particulate material. This invention is directed to a bonding method for bonding particulate material, such as metals, ceramics, ferro-magnets and high temperature alloys and forming products by bonding. The method comprises the steps of: (a) placing at least one particulate material over a given surface and
