Various hormones, including insulin, cortisol, prolactin, and growth hormone, have been implicated in milk synthesis. However, previous studies have mainly used single serum measurements. In this study the relationships among hormones (insulin, cortisol, prolactin, and growth hormone) in serum and milk were investigated using simultaneously collected milk and blood samples from lactating ewes for a 24-h period. Milk production, milk composition, and in-situ ligated ligated stomach and duodenum were evaluated. The glandular stomach and duodenal contents were emptied. Liver samples were obtained. Milk samples were analyzed for protein, lactose, and total solids. Serum samples were analyzed for hormones and cortisol in the following order of decreasing concentration: prolactin, growth hormone, insulin, cortisol, and lactate dehydrogenase. Milk samples were analyzed for protein, lactose, and total solids. In the beginning of the 24-h sampling period, no relationships between hormones in serum and milk were found. Later, relationships between cortisol in serum and milk appeared, and these were primarily inversely correlated. The relationships between insulin, growth hormone, and prolactin in serum and milk were similar to the relationships in serum. No linear relationships among the hormones were found. Our results clearly show that the relationships between hormones in milk and blood were influenced by the time of sample collection.
