When a man believes in himself, it is his kick in the net. What does it mean "it's your kick in the net"? Does it have anything to do with the sport of football (amateur/professional)? A: I can't prove it, but I suspect it refers to the sport of Rugby League (just one of several possible interpretations). As in the sport, the other team has possession of the ball, and after scoring a try, the ball is placed on a teammate's foot that has been kicked into the air. If that player makes contact with the ground with his foot (usually his knee or leg), then the ball is in the opposing team's possession and it's their "kick in the net". A: It's a pun, probably not intended to be that subtle, but here is how I see it: When a player sees "themselves" as an obstacle (or "kick in the net") they haven't really taken in all they can do. A "kick in the net" would be a small, almost insignificant movement (touching the ball with one's foot), but players still want to
