It appears to be either a game download of some kind or Steam authentication. The file you posted is almost certainly a password for Steam, but its type is not recognisable. This is a highly common way of protecting a password. The file is encrypted with AES, and the AES decryption key is added to the end. The AES key in a compressed form is sprinkled throughout the file, so that the file cannot be unpacked and the key extracted without having to decrypt the entire file first. The compressed form means you cannot easily recognize the key from looking at the file. But note that the key would not unlock the file, it just makes it possible to open the file. To actually decrypt the file, you'd need to know the AES key, and then search for it. You could try using an AES decrypter, for example, or feed the file to an online decryption engine. If the key is a hash
