There is a strong economic incentive to provide customized pricing for the products and services that businesses and individuals buy and sell. Customization of product or service pricing can take many forms. The prices of products and services may differ across time or by location. A wholesale distributor may offer a discount to a retailer in exchange for the retailer's agreement to make substantial purchases from the wholesale distributor. The price of a product may vary depending on whether or not the product has been previously purchased. A seller of goods or services may wish to offer a discount to customers who have previously purchased a certain number of goods or services. An airline may offer different flight prices to different customers depending on whether the customer is traveling for business or pleasure. Websites may be designed so that different people with different web browsers are offered different versions of a webpage. The variation of pricing across products, items, and services, and across times, locations, and users, is difficult to capture and track, especially where the data changes from moment to moment. For instance, when a user logs into his or her bank account, the account balance will usually be different from moment to moment. When a user buys a product, the quantity and, potentially, the price, of the product may change from moment to moment. When a user places a telephone order, the order may be for different quantities of different products. As a result, the data capture systems that may be used to track pricing and discounts must have the ability to capture data that changes moment to moment

.Q: How to use a subset of Javascript object properties in the class constructor? Is it possible to use a subset of properties from a Javascript object passed to a class constructor? The following works: function MyClass(obj) { //... } But is there a way to only use the values of the object that are used in the class constructor? I know that function MyClass(obj) { if(obj.foo && obj.bar)... } will not work, but is there a way to use obj.foo and obj.bar without checking them with an if statement? A: If there are properties with the same names as the arguments passed to the constructor, the arguments object will be expanded into a dictionary. That is: MyClass(obj); is identical to MyClass({"foo": obj.foo, "bar": obj.bar}); so you can do: var myClass = new MyClass({"foo": obj.foo, "bar": obj.bar}); Note that if a property name does not exist, obj[propName] throws a TypeError. emissions with an AB-grade engine for the first time. In stock at PSN Only 1,699 available worldwide After seven weeks in stock, the Tucson RTR was released in April 2014 with an AB engine. Now that the engine switch has been completed we're pleased to announce the delay of the 4th version so that it's the best version ever! Our 2005-spec engine configuration was conceived to allow the power of the to shine through to racers on the NA A/S and J/S classes, but it is also the most durable engine configuration from the factory and has a reputation for longevity, which has contributed to the longevity of the Tucson after nearly a decade in the hands of racers and collectors. We've never seen A/S and J/S racers move from this Tucson to another until now! The timing chain becomes a problem with 24,000 miles! The chain stretches and for the first time the chain snaps like a chainlink fence! The Tucson is rear-
